Richard Weber addresses this question and analyzes the effects of a large-scale compulsory entrepreneurship course on students' entrepreneurial intentions by employing a quasi-experimental approach. Moreover, he highlights the role of social interactions among students in building entrepreneurial skills. The results yield important implications for public policy, sponsors and lecturers of entrepreneurship education.

Richard Weber Evaluating entrepreneurship education

Evaluating entrepreneurship education, a pioneering thesis by Richard Weber, focuses on evaluating the effects of entrepreneurship education through empirical analysis. Based on the dataset collected from questionnaires of two universities and the theories of social psychology, economics, and sociology, the author presents three approaches to evaluate the size and nature of the effects of entrepreneurship education and suggests an approach to improve its design to achieve the set goals.
